The first part of the paper discusses the general theory of the firm, and the second part discusses the empirical evidence. The general theory of the firm is based on the idea that firms are organized to minimize costs. This is done by hiring labor and capital in the most efficient way possible. The empirical evidence shows that firms do indeed minimize costs, and that they do so in a way that is consistent with the theory. This suggests that the theory of the firm is a good approximation of reality.
