REFERRING to the Notice from this office, dated the 25th June 1821, relative to the reception of Chronometers in a Depot opened at the Royal Observatory, at Greenwich; the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty hereby make known, that after a consideration of the rates of the Chronometers which have been compared for twelve months at the Royal Observatory (including the time that several of them were sent to the Island of Madeira), their Lordships have, with the advice of the Board of Longitude, ordered the Chronometer of Mr. Barraud, number 957, to be purchased at the first premium price of three hundred pounds, and the Chronometer of Mr. Pennington, number 154, to be purchased at the second premium price of two hundred pounds.

And their Lordships further make known that the following rules and regulations will during the present year, and until further notice, be observed in comparing the rates of the Chronometers deposited upon trial at the Royal Observatory, and in assigning the premiums for the Chronometers which shall have kept the best and the second best time, viz.

"The mean of the daily rates for each month in the year shall be separately computed, and the difference between the greatest and least of these mean rates being taken for each Chronometer, this difference shall be doubled, and added to the mean monthly variation; that is, to the mean difference of the greatest and least daily rates in each month; and the excellence of the Chronometer shall be determined by the smallness of this sum; but no Chronometer shall have a claim to the first prize if it exceed six seconds, nor to the second if it exceed ten."
