

handed her into the Coach, being attended as in her going to Church. The Grief that appeared on her Majesty's Face was too strong a Testimony of what had passed between her and her tender Mother, not to sensibly affect the whole Court.

Detachments of the Noble German and Hungarian Guards, with their Officers and Trumpets at their Head, were ranged on the Place of the Court: A Party of the Foot-Guards, with their Officers, formed there two Lines. The Guards and Grand Guard beat the March, and a Detachment of Dragoons preceded her Sicilian Majesty, who went out of Town attended as follows:

Three Postillions blowing their Horns. A Coach and Six for the Count de Paar, Grand Post-Master. An Officer of the Post-Office on Horseback. A Coach and Six for Four Chambellans of the Court. Another for the Marshal Count de Pallaviciny, (appointed Ambassador and Plenipotentiary from their Imperial Majesties, for conducting and delivering the Queen of Naples to the King her Spouse) for the Count de Schaffgotsch, Grand Master, and for Two Chambellans. Her Majesty's own Coach and Six, with two Court Postillions, in which was the Queen, with the Countess de Paar as her Grand Maitresse: Four of the Noble German Guards, a Messenger of State, and two Court Postillions, followed the Coach on Horseback. Two other Coaches and Six for the Countess de Schaffgotsch and Four Ladies of the Court. Another Detachment of Dragoons closed the March.

At her Majesty's passing through the Streets, they were lined with Citizens under Arms, and the whole Body of the Magistrates were assembled in the Square called Stock am Eisen; all the Streets and Suburbs, through which her Majesty passed, were crowded with Spectators, and occupied by Troops both of Horse and Foot. She was saluted at her going out by the Cannon of the Rampart, and the Musquetry of one Battalion ranged on the Bastion facing the Court. The Emperor, who was set out before, has accompanied the Queen to Neustadt, from whence he came back Yesterday Noon.
