Dispatch from General Viscount Cathcart, dated Leipsig, October 19, 1813.

MY LORD,

THE Allies have gained a complete victory, and Buonaparte, who left Leipsig at ten o'clock this morning, is retiring with such precipitation and disorder, that Generals Regnier, Lauriston, Bertrand, and several others, were taken in this city, or near it.

The intention of the enemy being apparent, the Russian reserve, and the troops which had been least engaged, marched at an early hour up the Elster to endeavour to stop him, Cossacks having been already detached, under the Attaman Count Platoff, to destroy bridges, and to occasion every possible difficulty and embarrassment.

General Blücher has also detached a strong corps to go up the left bank of the Saale.

The operations which have led to this great event are as follows:

The Emperor Alexander having rendered the army of reserve under General Bennigsen disposable for active service, that General marched from the Saxon frontier in Silesia into Bohemia, and arrived on the left bank of the Elbe, by Aussig and Leutmeritz, in the first days of October, and immediately relieved the outposts of Prince Schwarzenberg's army in front of Toplitz, towards Dresden, and occupied the same position.

As General Bennigsen approached, the grand army moved to its left, reinforced its posts at Marienberg and the mouths of the defiles in that direction, occupying Zwickau and Chemnitz, the remainder of the army removing by Brix to Commotau, to which town their Imperial Majesties removed their head-quarters on the 5th instant, the Prince Schwarzenberg having already moved to Marienberg.

On the 6th and 7th, General Count Wittgenstein advanced from Zwickau towards Altenburg, and General Count Klenau from Chemnitz to Peuig, where the enemy made some resistance; but appeared in more force upon the Hehe Wasser and River Tchoppa, where there was an affair of some importance.

Meanwhile it had been concerted that General Blücher and the Prince Royal of Sweden should cross the Elbe, and that the further advance of the Bohemian army should be regulated by their movement. On the 7th, a report was received that General Blücher, by the most rapid and brilliant movement that has been made during this war, marched from Elsterwerda to the mouth of the Black Elster, near the town of that name, and having crossed by the bridge he carried with him, defeated the French corps at Wartemberg, driving its remains to Wittenberg, and immediately advanced within reach of the Prince Royal, who had bridges at Rosslau and Acken.

On the 8th, accounts were received at Commotau that the Prince Royal had crossed the Elbe, and was in communication with Blücher. On that day a general advance was made from all the posts on the Bohemian frontier, including General Bennigsen's army, who, after a serious resistance by the enemy, drove him into Koenigstein and Dresden, opened a communication with General Bubna near Pirna, successively occupying Dippoldiswalda and Freyberg, placing himself before Dresden on the left bank of the Elbe, while Prince Tcherbatoff observed him on the right bank. All the corps, however, opposed to General Bennigsen, and part of that which was between Dresden and Bautzen, having assembled in Dresden, no farther attack in that quarter was judged expedient.

It was now evident that Buonaparte had left Dresden, and was concentrating his army at Leipsig, and at Wurzen, and Eulenburg: the Elector of Saxony following with his family.

The Emperor of Russia left Commotau in the night of the 8th, followed by the reserve of his army, which advanced by rapid and successive marches to Altenburg, where the Austrian, Russian, and Prussian reserves were assembled on the 11th and 12th, and where the Emperor Alexander and the Field-Marshal's quarters were established.

The remainder of the grand army had proceeded down the Elster by Zeist and Pegau to Lutzen, on its left, and to Borna and Espeubeim on its right, General Blücher having moved to Halle, a direct communication was opened, through Merseberg, with that General and the Prince Royal.

The enemy shewed a line of troops in the villages of Gröben, Golsa, Stormenthal, and Kora, between the Pleiss and the Partha, which having been attacked by Count Wittgenstein and General Klenau, on the 13th, a considerable affair took place, in which the enemy was dislodged on his right, and it would have been more serious if the Field-Marshal who came up had not judged it premature, and put a stop to it.

Orders had been sent to General Bennigsen, to leave General Count Peter Tolstoy with a considerable force to mask Dresden and Konigstein, and to march with the remainder of his force and General Bubna's corps by Nossen on Grmma, while Count Colloredo, who had been left with his corps to act with General Bennigsen, was to march by Freyberg and Chemnitz, to join and support the Field-Marshal's army.

During this period the Bavarian treaty was signed, which opened new lines of communication to the South; and Marshal Augereau, who had been much harassed and impeded in his march, and had lost part of his corps, reached Leipsig with the remainder. Buonaparte had also made a journey to Wittenberg, and sent troops to destroy, or to oblige the Allies to destroy the bridges at Rosslau and Acken, pushing a small corps to Zerbst, by which he gave some ground to believe that he meant to march down the right bank of the Mulda, to pass the Elbe at Wittenberg, and to re-pass again at Magdeburg. This feint had the effect of inducing the Prince Royal to fall back to Cöthen, where he assembled his army. Finding, however, that the movement of the enemy on the right bank of the Elbe had no other consequence, he decided to return to General Blücher, and to take his post in the general action with that General.

Reports having been received of the march of General Bennigsen and Count Colloredo, the army marched on the 15th from Altenberg to Pegau (the place of assembly on the morning of the battle of Lutzen); and it was determined to attack the enemy the following morning, without waiting for the certainty of the arrival either of the Prince Royal, General Bennigsen, or Count Colloredo, judging that their forces would influence the enemy by their approach, and that they would be fresh for the second day; whereas by waiting, the enemy might either improve his preparations, or escape. Accordingly the heads of all the columns advanced towards the enemy's position at day-break on the 16th, General Blücher by Schenditz to Göltz and Wetteritz, General Giulay by Lutzen on Lindenau; General Count Mehrfeldt between the Elster and Pleisse, on Connowitz; General Prince of Hesse Hombourg, on the right bank of the Elster, in the same direction, to support Count Wittgenstein towards Waclaw, with General Kleist on his right, towards Liebert Wolkeritz; and General Klenau on the extreme right towards Fuchshayn, on the Grünmal road.

The enemy occupied the only ridge in this plain in front of the named places, behind the centre of which, towards Leipzig, Buonaparte's tent was pitched. He was also in force at Connowitz, on the side of General Giulay's advance, and towards General Blücher.

At half past nine, immediately on the Emperor's arrival on the field, the cannonade began with Count Wittgenstein's corps, and immediately extended to both flanks on the whole position, and was continued, without any intermission, till after dark at night.

It was intended that Count Mehrfeldt and General Klenau should turn the enemy on their respective flanks, but the French were in great force on their left, and the quantity of water, and the number of gardens and summer-houses near Connowitz, rendered Count Mehrfeldt's task extremely arduous.

Count Wittgenstein almost immediately drove the enemy from the heights opposed to him, and the whole ridge was for some time occupied by the Allies; but a large force of infantry and cavalry opposed to General Kleist, occasioned a continual contest during the whole morning.

Count Mehrfeldt, having advanced to Connowitz, beyond the right of the force opposed to Count Wittgenstein, repaired a bridge which had been destroyed on the Pleisse at Dolitz, and was about to pass over, when, unfortunately, his horse was killed, and himself taken prisoner by a column of the enemy, which was supposed to be a division of the Allies retiring.

At the same time Murat, at the head of an immense body of cavalry, appeared on the ridge, on the right of Count Wittgenstein, and judging that he had time to attack before the Russian reserve could come up to him, he sent on the light artillery of the guard, and immediately afterwards charged with his masses of cavalry. The Russian reserve had broken ground in its front, which rendered it impossible for the cuirassiers to meet him with the velocity they desired; but the cavalry of Count Wittgenstein's corps, and attached to it, attacked him in flank, and he retired with as much precipitation as he advanced.

During the preparation of Murat's attack, the Austrian cavalry was greatly distinguished; they made nine charges on the enemy's right, in some of which they swept the whole front with great slaughter. The Russian cuirassiers having advanced, together with the guards and grenadiers, and the latter having occupied a wood on their right, no further attack was made; but the cannonade and fire of the tirailleurs continued till after dark, when the troops lay upon their arms upon the ground they occupied.

General Giulay, opposed by superior force, could not penetrate. General Blücher had a brilliant action, and defeated the force opposed to him, taking upwards of thirty pieces of cannon, an eagle, and more than two thousand prisoners.

The next morning at day-break, Count Wittgenstein's corps appeared on the ground from whence he had driven the enemy, but the heads of columns of the French cavalry and infantry were on their right on the same ridge, the cannon on each side almost within musket shot, and the videttes without pistol shot; and in this attitude the armies remained the whole day, without firing a shot, except some accidental skirmishing by the advanced men. Three great corps were advancing rapidly to join the Allies; it was therefore evidently not to their advantage to renew the attack, unless either General Blücher or the Field-Marshal was attacked by the enemy, in which case, either would have advanced immediately to support the other. Count Colloredo arrived at the village of Magdebourg at noon, and in the evening relieved Count Wittgenstein, who became his support. In the evening also part of General Bennigsen's corps arrived, and would have immediately marched upon the enemy's flank, had not the General been acquainted, while framing his attack, that the action was postponed. The Prince Royal also sent notice, that he would arrive on General Blücher's left by the afternoon of the next day.

The received disposition for troops in these plains, is now, to form immense solid columns of infantry and cavalry, which are denominated masses, and which are distributed according to the ground, in one or more lines, always with reserves, in front are great quantities of artillery, within reach of support. All villages, and broken or covered ground, are occupied by detachments, furnished by the nearest masses, and supported by them; and which, being defended by musketry, always occasion great slaughter. Except on such occasions, and as skirmishers, the infantry and the cavalry are seldom seen in line, but the masses which are usually formed behind the centre of the corps which composes them respectively, can always extend expeditiously to a larger front or into line.

Wurtzen was occupied on the 17th, by a detachment of General Bennigsen's army.

On the 18th, the disposition for a general action was carried into effect; Marshal Schwarzenberg's order of battle, from left to right, was as follows: Count Colloredo's corps, supported by the Austrian reserve, and connected with General Mehrfeldt's corps, Count Wittgenstein and General Kleist, supported by the Russian reserve; General Klenau, his right a little brought forward, supported also by Russian grenadiers; General Bennigsen, his right still more advanced towards Pösa; beyond the morass on his right, General Bubna and Gócht Platoff were advanced, connecting between General Bennigsen and the Prince Royal.

General Blücher was to advance between his Royal Highness and the great morass, which extends from Merseburg to Leipzig; and General Giulay in his original direction from Lutzen upon Lindenau.

The village of Liebest Wolkeritz, was the point to which all the attacks under the direction of the Field-Marshal were to point; the corps advancing towards a central point, thereby becoming gradually more closely connected, and the more distant corps on the right advancing first.

The enemy occupied the villages with masses in their rear, but the more distant posts were carried without being much supported, the masses retiring with precipitation towards the suburbs of Leipzig. All the villages, however, were defended with cannon, which rendered the action and the cannonade general over the whole extent of the plain.

Some of the villages nearest this city, were most obstinately disputed. The whole plain is covered with bodies of dead men and horses; and the ruins of the villages, are full of heaps of dead and dying.

Every part of the combination succeeded; General Blücher's left, connected with the Prince Royal's advanced corps, consisting of the Russians and Prussians, came into action in the afternoon, having approached by Tauttha. Towards the latter part of the day, by far the most serious and obstinate efforts of attack and defence were made at the villages of Stetteritz and Probsteyda, the former of which was taken and retaken several times; the latter held out till dark. Napoleon was several times between these villages, animating his men, and sending in fresh troops till dark; and it must be confessed, that they were most gallantly defended.

The Emperor of Russia was with his army during the whole of the three days; on the first he was joined in the field by the King, who had remained at Töplitz, and had accompanied General Bennigsen's army in its actions near Pirna and before Dresden.

In the afternoon of the 18th, the Emperor of Austria arrived, and joined the other Monarchs near the village of Probsteyda, where their Majesties remained till dark.

The enemy had then been driven from every part of his position, into a circle within cannon shot of Leipzig, from whence a column had already begun its march towards the south-west. In the night, the villages of Stetteritz and Probsteyda were abandoned, and occupied by the allies; but Buonaparte continued to hold Leipzig, and the villages connected with the suburbs, with a strong rear-guard towards the allies.

He seems to have counted upon the presence of the Saxon Electoral Family, and the solicitations of the inhabitants to preserve the city, to gain time; and to provide for his own security, but he was disappointed. The Emperor Alexander received a flag of truce, sent in the name of the King of Saxony, offering to capitulate to save the town. His Imperial Majesty gave his answer aloud, in the hearing of many hundred officers, with remarkable force and dignity: he said, in substance, that an army in pursuit of a flying enemy, and in the hour of victory, could not be stopped a moment by considerations for the town; that, therefore, the gates must be immediately opened, and, in that case, the most strict discipline should be observed; that if the German troops in the place chose to join their countrymen in this army, they should be received as brothers; but that he considered any proposal sent, while Napoleon was at hand, as extremely suspicious, as he well knew the enemy he had to deal with; that as to the King of Saxony personally, who had taken a line of determined hostility, he gave no answer, and declined making any communication.

The heavy cannon and columns of attack were ordered to advance. In the mean while, the Prince Royal attacked and stormed the city on the other side, a Prussian corps being the first in the square.

General Toll, who had been sent with the Saxon flag of truce to ensure the correct delivery of the message, was, at that moment, in the Elector of Saxony's apartment, and, running out, called to the Saxon Guards to lay down their arms, which they instantly did; their example being followed by the Baden and Wurtemberg troops. The action continued some time in the further part of the town, and, before it ceased, the Emperor and the King entered with the Field Marshal, and met the Prince Royal at the door of the Elector of Saxony's quarters. General Blücher arrived also at the same time. All the cannon was taken, the particulars of which are not yet collected.

A guard of Russian grenadiers immediately mounted over the Elector of Saxony, and their Majesties rode out to see the Prince Royal's army.

The Emperor of Austria arrived during the day in Leipzig.

The Austrian and Bavarian army, under General Wrede, will reach Wurtzburg the 24th. The Russian reserve will get to Pegau this evening.

The extent of this important day cannot as yet be ascertained. Near half a million of soldiers fought in this battle, probably one of the most extensive and most generally engaged that ever took place, at least in modern history.

The presence of the Sovereigns has certainly a most animating effect on their armies. All have behaved well; the Austrians have had a full share, and many of their Generals have been wounded. The Field-Marshal Prince Schwartzenberg received the Grand Cross of Maria Theresa from the hands of His Imperial Master, and that of the first class of St. George from the Emperor Alexander. General Barclay de Tolly is created a Count.

This is the eighth general action, seven of them commanded by the Ruler of France, in which I have seen the Emperor Alexander in the field at the head of his army; as usual, unmindful of personal danger, he approached every column, animating the officers and men by his presence and example; and, by a few energetic words, touching the chords which produce the strongest effects on the minds of Russian soldiers, confidence in the Supreme Being, resignation to His will, and attachment to their Sovereign.

I have the honour to be, &c.

October 20.—P. S. During the action, whole brigades of Bavarian and Saxon troops came over and joined the Allies, some artillery and cavalry are said to have been actually engaged with the French.

Near three hundred pieces of artillery, some of which were buried, and upwards of thirty thousand prisoners, including the sick and wounded found in this place, have already been ascertained to be in the possession of the Allies.

Exclusive of the King of Saxony and his family, the following are among the most distinguished prisoners: Comte de Hohberg, Baron de Hokorn, Prince Emile de Hessed, Baden and Hessian Generals; Generals Count Lauriston, Dhesnain, Delmas, Regnier, Aubry, Charpentier; General of Division Krasinsky; Prince Poniatowsky, drowned; Bony, Bertrand, Latour Maubourg, dead of his wounds.

The armies are in full pursuit of the enemy. The grand army to turn his left; part of General Blücher's army observe his right; and he is followed by the Prince Royal with Generals Bennigsen and Blücher.

Dispatch from Lieutenant-General the Honourable Sir C. Stewart, dated Leipsig, Oct. 21, 1813.

MY LORD,

I HAVE the honour to acquaint your Lordship, that, by intelligence received from Count Tolstoy's corps, which was left to watch the force under General Gouvion St. Cyr, in garrison at Dresden, the enemy finding the army had moved away, commenced an offensive operation on Count Tolstoy, which they have followed up with some success, as he was much overpowered by numbers. He has taken up a position at Peterswalde, by the last accounts.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) CHARLES STEWART.

P. S. I inclose a report I have received from Colonel Cooke, of the operation before Dresden, on the 13th instant. C. S.

Inclosure referred to in the preceding Dispatch, dated Freyburg, October 14, 1813.

SIR,

THE army of reserve under the immediate command of General Bennigsen, advanced from Töp-litz by the way of Peterswalde, so soon as it was known that the grand army, under Marshal Prince Schwartzberg, had occupied Altenberg.

The enemy made some stand at the strong camp of Pirna, as well as at Dorna, from whence they were driven into Dresden. This occurred upon the 11th and 12th instant.

Upon the morning of the 13th instant the army was assembled around Dresden, and the Austrian corps under General Count Bubna, crossed over to the left bank of the Elbe, between Pirna and Königstein.

No. 16813.

In order to obtain, if possible, the nature of the enemy's plan and defence, as well as of his strength, a movement was made by the whole army appearing in columns upon the grand plain adjacent to the town.

The village of Plauen, upon the southern suburb of the town, was occupied, with a view not only of obtaining from thence the above-named intelligence, but in order to defend the movement of that portion of this army which were to march by the way of Wildsruf and Freyburg, to join the grand army.

So soon as the troops debouched from Plauen, the enemy brought out of Dresden about fourteen pieces of artillery, with a proportion of cavalry and infantry. A small skirmish ensued, without either party gaining ground; but the enemy studiously confined themselves to keeping us in check, without moving a man beyond the walls of the town, more than was necessary for this object.

I learn from the best intelligence that General Gouvion St. Cyr commands in person, having, altogether, two corps, amounting to about twenty-five thousand men.

Fresh works had been constructed since we last appeared against the town, and it was, altogether, materially strengthened.

Under these circumstances, it was at once determined to mask the place, leaving for this purpose twenty-five thousand men, under the command of General Tolstoy; the remainder of the army continuing its march upon Wildsruf and Freyburg.

The enemy have strengthened Pirna, and seem inclined to maintain their line of communication upon the right bank of the Elbe. A portion of Count Bubna's force has been left to watch that place.

His Majesty the King of Prussia accompanied this army, and was, as usual, constantly with the most advanced. His Majesty's head-quarters were at Lokovitz the 13th instant, and at Freyburg the night of the 14th.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) H. COOKE.

Lieutenant-General Sir Charles Stewart,
&c. &c. &c.

Dispatch from Lieutenant-General the Honourable Sir Charles Stewart, dated Leipsig, October 21, 1813.

MY LORD,

THE pursuit of the enemy continues on all sides; and prisoners, baggage, and the attirail of a flying army, are hourly sending in by the Cossacks and light troops.

Buonaparte certainly reached Lützen on the 19th; and it seems, that he will either direct his march across the Saale, and make for Nordhausen; in order to place himself ultimately behind the Weser, calling Marshal Davoust's army from the North to his aid, or attempt to move upon the Chaussee to Erfurth, after passing the Saale at Weissenfels. It is almost impossible he should escape but with the wreck of an army; but your Lordship will easily imagine, that masses directed in one line may force their way through smaller corps.

The following disposition of the allied army was agreed upon yesterday, and is, I believe, to be carried into effect: the grand army of Bohemia marches upon the enemy's right, in the direction of Frankfort upon the Main, taking the route of Pegau, Zeist, and Ersenberg.

The army of General Bennigsen, united to the army of the North, and under the orders of the Crown Prince, follows the enemy's centre in the direction of Lutzen and Mersberg.

The glorious army of Silesia was hardly arrived near Leipsig, when it took another cast-off to the right, and is to cotoyer the enemy's left by Merseberg, and this day its cannon are heard in that direction.

If the enemy passes the Saale at Weissenfels, the army of the Prince Royal, in that case, will move upon Feyberg.

The Saxon troops have been joined to the Prince Royal's army—a thousand Baden troops are considered prisoners of war. The details of the captures are greater than I had conceived; fifty more pieces of cannon have been found; many were buried by the enemy.

Prince Poniatowski, who received two wounds, in attempting to pass the Pleisse, in despair of getting off, was drowned in that river.

His Prussian Majesty has nominated General Blücher to the rank of Field-Marshal for his most pre-eminent services, and their Majesties the Emperors of Austria and Russia have conferred upon Marshal Prince Schwartzenberg, the first class of the Orders of St. George and Maria Theresa, and the King of Prussia, the Order of the Black Eagle.

Several battalions of Poles have joined the army.

The Emperor leaves this to-morrow for Zeitz or Ersenberg.

The Prince Royal, I understand, since writing the above, has changed his line of march, and moves to Naumburg.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) CHARLES STEWART,

Lieutenant-General.

Viscount Castlereagh, &c. &c. &c.

Dispatch from the Earl of Aberdeen, dated Leipsig, October 22, 1813.

My Lord,

I COULD expatiate with the utmost satisfaction, on all the particulars of the glorious and decisive victories, which have been obtained by the persevering valour of the Allies, in the neighbourhood of this city, but as these events will have been fully detailed to you by others more competent to the task, I shall spare your Lordship the fatigue of a tale twice told.

I am however enabled to furnish your Lordship with some of the latest information on this subject, contained in a communication made to me by Count Metternich this evening; by which it appears, that the results of the great battles of the 16th, 18th, and 19th, surpass all conception. The number of prisoners already taken is more than forty thousand; every hour adds materially to the amount. On the 20th, the corps which advanced in pursuit of the enemy took one hundred and twenty pieces of artillery. The whole number of cannon taken amounts to three hundred, and more than one thousand caissons have fallen into the hands of the Allies. The booty taken in this city is immense. The suburbs of the town, and the principal gates, are blocked up with carriages, baggage waggons, and equipages of every description.

It is impossible to form a notion of the disorder which reigned among the enemy during the flight. Buonaparte quitted the town with considerable difficulty, as all the principal streets were completely impassable from the disorderly mass of fugitives.—Prince Poniatowski and Marshal Macdonald finding it impossible to escape, spurred their horses and leapt into the Pleiss. The banks of the river being marshy and difficult of access, Poniatowski was seen to perish, by his Aide-de-Camp, who is now a prisoner. As Macdonald has not been discovered, it is supposed that he shared the same fate. Since the day before yesterday, several thousand bodies have been taken from the river. The streets and high roads are heaped with dead bodies, and with wounded whom hitherto it has been found impossible to remove.

Twenty-seven Generals have been already taken, but it is possible the list may be augmented, as the number of prisoners of every rank becomes greater hourly. Among those who have been recognised, besides Lauriston, Regnier, and Bertrand, are Mandeville, Peri, Krazinsky, Bronikowsky, Kaminiesky, Rautenstrauck, the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt, Count Frederic of Hochberg, the Prince Witgenstein, &c.

General Latour Maubourg is dead of his wounds. General Souham is mortally wounded.

In the action of the 16th, Buonaparte himself very narrowly escaped being made prisoner. In consequence of a most desperate charge made by the Austrian cuirassiers, the French line was broken through, and Buonaparte, with the persons round him, owed their safety to the fleetness of their horses.

According to intelligence received from General Blücher, whom His Majesty the King of Prussia has just made Field-Marshal, he entered Weissenfels last night, and took two thousand prisoners, as well as one thousand six hundred wounded, whom the enemy left in their flight.

The grand army under the command of Field-Marshal Prince Schwartzenberg, is advancing by forced marches in the direction of Jena.

His Imperial Majesty went yesterday to Zeitz, in order to follow the enemy, who, it is not imagined, can have more than eighty thousand men.

On the 24th of this month, General Wrede will be at Wurtzburg, with about sixty thousand men.

The Austrian army is animated with the best spirit, which is increased by the just title the Commander in Chief has acquired to their confidence. His Imperial Majesty has decorated him with the Great Cross of the order of Maria Theresa. The Emperor of Russia has conferred on him the Great Cross of the order of St. George; and full justice is rendered to his merits, by the unanimous voice of the allied army.

I cannot conclude without congratulating your Lordship, on the brilliant prospect which opens before us. The long sufferings of many nations are drawing to a close. The deliverance of Europe appears to be at hand. That ray of hope for the salvation of the civilized world, which has so steadily beamed from our own happy shores, is now rapidly diffused over the whole Continent. If any thing can add to our feelings of exultation, as Englishmen, at this prospect, it is the reflection that this event will be mainly attributable to the unshaken constancy and perseverance of Great Britain. I am truly happy to be able to state to your Lordship, that this feeling is not confined to ourselves, but is admitted and avowed by all those who are most entitled to consideration.

I have the honour to be, &c.

DISPATCHES from Captain Farquhar, commanding His Majesty's naval forces in the Weser, to Mr. Croker, dated Braak, 12th November, stating that he had received from the Senate of Bremen, a notification, under date of the 9th instant, of its happy reinstatement in its ancient Constitution, and of its ardent wish to enter into the most friendly intercourse with the Authorities of His Britannic Majesty.

Admiralty-Office, November 23, 1813.

THE following are extracts and copies of dispatches received by Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Pellew, Bart. from Rear-Admiral Freemantle, and transmitted by the former to John Wilson Croker, Esq.

(Extract.)

ON the 6th of September arrived at Fiume, and found His Majesty's ships Milford and Wizard at anchor off the town, and the Imperial flag flying, the whole of Austria, and Croatia (nearly) up in arms against the French, and are driving them out in all directions: Signi, Porto Re, and Fiume, are under the Austrian flag. General Nugent has his head-quarters at Lippa, about twenty-two miles from Fiume; his force consists of two thousand Austrians, and some Croats; the French garrison of Pola, of six hundred men; with about fifteen hundred Croats, were marching to relieve Fiume, but the Croats, on hearing that their countrymen were in arms against the French, surrounded, disarmed, and took the six hundred Frenchmen prisoners, and sent them to General Nugent into Fiume. On the 7th instant, the enemy formed a plan of attack on General Nugent's corps; they intended marching in two divisions, one from the Adelsberg road, of three thousand, and the other from Trieste, of one thousand; they were to have met near Lippa at the same moment, and attempt to drive General Nugent back on Fiume, and to retake the town; but by good fortune, the division of three thousand arrived at its points four hours before the other, and General Nugent's corps marched immediately ten miles to the attack, and drove them back with some loss, and prisoners.

On his return, he found that the other division had arrived at their points, and marched five miles to attack them, which he did in the most gallant manner, driving them fifteen miles, killed three hundred, and took two hundred prisoners; which was a march of forty miles, without resting a moment, or eating a morsel. General Nugent lost in this affair only one man: most of the prisoners were dreadfully sabred about the head; and the General was fortunate enough to take one cannon, and a great quantity of ammunition, which was very much wanted, more than he had with him and expended since the commencement of his operations.

On the 9th General Nugent took four hundred more prisoners. The Croats are flocking in daily to the Imperial standard; the greatest joy and enthusiasm prevail amongst all ranks of people, and they swear to follow the example of Spain, and never to admit the French again into their country, while a man remains alive. On the 7th instant, the Croats in garrison at Lusin, in number one hundred and fifty, spiked the guns, and at day-light obliged the French commander, at the point of the bayonet, to pay up their arrears, and then sent all the French troops (thirty) to Istria, and gave up the island to the natives; the Croats went to their homes, but, as their regiments had joined General Nugent, it is hoped they will also. On the 8th, the Wizard sailed with an Austrian officer of the Briuni islands; he endeavoured to open a communication with the inhabitants of Pola and Trieste. The greatest confidence and harmony subsists between General Nugent and Rear-Admiral Freemantle, and indeed among all classes, civil and military. The Milford lying at Fiume, gives General Nugent an additional force of one thousand men, which he must have left to guard Fiume, and cramp his operations very much. There is not a single soldier there; the town is entirely guarded by the Milford marines, who are there, and it greatly increases the confidence of the inhabitants, having a safe retreat in case of a defeat.

Supplies of all kinds are abundant.

The fleet will require no assistance, or wants, except cables, sails, and cordage.

Almost the whole of the islands are now clear of the French yoke, from Lissa upwards. A Captain Gower landed at Fontane, and has planted the Imperial flag all along that coast. Major Slicer, of the 35th, had arrived at Fiume on the 7th, and set off for Lippa to offer General Nugent a part of the garrison of Lissa, but do not know whether accepted.

Milford, off Ragosniza, 5th August, 1813.

SIR,

I have the honour to acquaint you, that the boats of this ship, with those of the Weazle, succeeded last night in surprising the garrison of Ragosniza.

The boats left the ship after dark, about seven leagues from the land, and having passed the sea-battery, within pistol shot, unperceived, landed at the back of the island; at day-light the enemy were saluted with a general cheer of our people, from the top of the hill, when they carried the battery, open in the rear, without much resistance; containing six twenty-four pounders, and two seven and half inch mortars.

Although I have more than once had occasion to mention the zeal of Captain Black, I should be wanting if I were not to make known to you, his unvaried endeavours to forward the public service; and how much I am indebted for the cordiality with which he received my suggestions: he speaks in high terms of the conduct of Lieutenant Grant, of the Milford; of Lieutenant Parker, of the Royal Marines, with all those employed on this occasion.

We have sustained no loss; the enemy, two killed, and one wounded. The French seem to have attached much importance to this place, for the protection of their convoys; as two engineers, with a great number of artificers, were employed erecting a tower at the top of the hill; those, with an officer of rank, made their escape: a captain, subaltern, and sixty-one soldiers, remain prisoners. The civic guard laid down their arms, and were permitted to return to their habitations.

The Weazle will escort to Lissa the guns, mortars, stores, and ammunition. I have burnt the signal tower, and not left one stone upon another.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) T. F. FREEMANTLE.

The Eagle, off Rovigno, 3d August, 1813.

SIR,
SAILING along the coast of Istria, yesterday evening, in company with His Majesty's ship Bacchante, a convoy of twenty-one sail was seen at anchor, in the harbour of Rovigno. Conceiving the capture of them feasible, I communicated my intentions to Captain Hoste, who led in, and a firing was commenced on the batteries. After some resistance they were abandoned, when the boats of each ship, with parties of royal marines, under the command of Captain Hoste, landed, and drove the enemy out of the town, took possession of the batteries, disabled the guns, and demolished the different works, without suffering any other accident than a private of royal marines, of His Majesty's ship Eagle, being wounded.

The enemy scuttled the greater part of the vessels on our approach, but by the active exertions of the officers and men employed, the whole were completely destroyed or brought off, and the ships and other vessels burnt, that were building, or on the stocks.

The conduct of the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines, employed on this service, merits my warmest encomiums.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) C. ROWLEY, Captain.

Rear-Admiral Freemantle, &c. &c. &c.

His Majesty's Ship Havannah, Adriatic, July 20, 1813.

SIR,
SUBJOINED is the statement of the result of an attack made by this ship, and His Majesty's sloop Partridge, upon a small convoy, seven in number, on the N.W. coast of Manfredonia, on the morning of the 18th instant.

I have, &c.

G. CADOGAN.

1 Neapolitan gun-boat, 1 eighteen-pounder, captured.

1 Neapolitan gun-boat, 1 eighteen-pounder, burnt.
1 pinnace, with 1 six-pounder, destroyed.

2 armed trabacalos, of 3 guns each, laden with salt, captured.

2 armed trabacalos, of 3 guns each, laden with salt, destroyed.

The gun-boats quite new, and belonging to the fifth division.

Rear-Admiral Freemantle.

His Majesty's Sloop Weazel, off Cape Otranto, August 24, 1813.

SIR,

I BEG leave to inform you, that two French gun-boats, La Tonnante and L'Auguste, were this day captured by His Majesty's sloop under my command, the former commanded by M. Simon, Enseigne de Vaisseau, carrying two guns, and a crew of forty men, the latter by M. N. Cranotich, of the same rank, carrying two guns and twenty-seven men.

Independent of their respective crews, they had on board thirty-seven officers and non-commissioned officers of the French army, among whom I find one major, five captains, and ten lieutenants.

They sailed from Fano last night, and when first seen this morning at daylight, were standing towards Otranto, in company with three others, but separated immediately on observing His Majesty's sloop making towards them. The capture of these two was not effected until after a chase of six hours, blowing fresh, which enabled the others to escape back into Fano.

I have, &c.

(Signed) J. BLACK.

B. W. Taylor, Esq. His Majesty's
Ship Apollo, off Corfu.

Admiralty-Office, November 23, 1813.

VICE-ADMIRAL Sir Edward Pellew has also transmitted to John Wilson Croker, Esq. a letter, addressed to Rear-Admiral Freemantle by Captain Harper of His Majesty's sloop Saracen, giving an account of the capture of the island of Mezzo, near Ragusa, by that sloop and the Weazle, on the 22d July last.

The island being of importance to the enemy, for the protection of their convoys, and it being understood to be their intention to reinforce the garrison from Ragusa, Captain Harper landed the marines of the two vessels; on the 17th, with some guns, which, with great exertions, were mounted in a battery on the top of a rocky mountain, which commanded the castle; and on the 22d, the enemy surrendered it, on condition of being allowed to land near Ragusa, under the engagement not to serve against Great Britain or her Allies, until exchanged.

One marine was killed, and two wounded.

Captain Harper praises in high terms the conduct of Captain Black, and the other officers and men of the Saracen and Weazle.

Lagos, August 18, 1813.

SIR,

I HAVE the honour to report, the capture of the French privateer Vautour, of Cette, by His Majesty's ship under my command, mounting four eighteen-pounders carronades, two long sixes, and a brass thirty-six-pounder amidships, manned with a complement of eighty men at the commencement of her cruize; but, on being taken possession of, only forty-seven on board, in a state of mutiny. — The officers were all confined, therefore she made not the least disposition to avoid us.

I have the honour to be, &c.
