Regulation for Vessels passing through English Narrows.

AS in passing through English Narrows it is advisable to wait for slack tide, and as, consequently, vessels bound in opposite directions (being unable to see each other) might meet in the critical part of the channel; it has been arranged between certain Companies, whose vessels constantly use the Inner Patagonian route, that when nearing the English Narrows ships should either fire a gun or sound their steam whistles; and that should vessels bound north meet vessels bound in the opposite direction, the ships bound north shall wait until the southward bound vessels have cleared the Narrows.

As this appears to be a prudent course to adopt in view of the difficult navigation and limited time of slack water, all Mariners should regulate their movements in accordance with it.

A note to the above effect has been placed on the Admiralty Charts.

This Notice affects the following Admiralty Plan:—English Narrows, No. 85. Also, South America Pilot, Part II, 1895, pages 257–261.
