

fit about eighty yards in front of a train which was approaching at fifteen miles an hour. Humphrey, a porter, who was standing some fifteen yards away, ran up and jumped on the line. The train at this moment was only a little over twenty yards off, and he was unable to remove the woman; but he succeeded in holding her down between the rails until the train came to a standstill, after the engine and one waggon had passed above them. By this brave action he saved the woman's life at great risk to himself.
