

great system of docks could no longer keep abreast of the growing needs of commerce. When I remember that this short interval was broken by the most tragic of all wars, from whose devastations men are still struggling to be free, I realise with what energy and determination you have carried out your work. Not only will this dock receive into its waters vessels of far greater size than have ever before entered the Port of London, but it has been equipped with the finest and most modern buildings and machinery to enable their cargoes to be unloaded and despatched more quickly than before to all parts of the kingdom and foreign countries. The new cargo jetty which you have made and opened at Tilbury within the last few weeks is another noble testimony to your enterprise. These works are the first-fruits of your labours, others of no less magnitude are contemplated, and I am confident that you will continue to discharge with zeal and wisdom the trust which Parliament has placed upon you, and that acting in the highest interests of commerce you will maintain the position of this port as the foremost port in the world.
