FRIDAY, 19 OCTOBER, 1956

Whitehall, October 19, 1956.

The following Addresses were presented to the QUEEN on the occasion of the opening of the Atomic Power Station at Calder Hall on Wednesday, October 17th, 1956, by the Lord Privy Seal, and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Authority:—

The Lord Privy Seal.

Your Majesty, your Excellencies, my Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen, I must begin by saying how sorry we all are that Lord Salisbury, the Minister responsible for atomic affairs, could not be with us today. He has asked me to say that he is deeply disappointed not to be present and that he sends every good wish for this great occasion.

All too often, in the Press and elsewhere, we see accounts of what are described as epoch making events and epoch making achievements, whereas in reality they are not of the first importance, even within a single epoch. But I believe that this occasion, in which we are taking part today, really does deserve that high sounding epithet. In years to come many atomic power stations will be built in this country and overseas. But to Calder Hall, here in Cumberland, will always belong the pride of having been the first station anywhere in the world to produce electricity from atomic energy on a full industrial scale. It does indeed mark the beginning of a new epoch.

It is, I feel, right that so historic an occasion should be honoured by the presence of Your Majesty, and I should like most respectfully to thank You, Madam, on behalf of the Government and indeed, I am sure, of the whole country, for having graciously consented to perform the opening ceremony of the new Power Station. We are also most pleased to welcome here today representatives of many countries where scientists and engineers are working to extend the peaceful applications of atomic energy.

In the last two hundred years vast industrial developments have transformed the conditions of life here in the United Kingdom and in many other countries as well. We can foresee this great process continuing far into the future and, every day, we see it expanding to touch countries which did not feel its first impact.

All this industrial development depends on power: indeed, in a sense, it is power—the harnessing of natural forces to do things for which man's hands are not strong enough or quick enough. The number of natural forces that mankind has found how to harness in this way is quite small—coal, oil and, in some parts of the world, flowing water. An addition to this small group of wasting assets is, therefore, a thing of tremendous importance. The "meaning" of Calder Hall is that such an addition has been made. This power station shows in practical terms that electricity for use in homes and factories can be produced by burning uranium in nuclear reactors.

Great Britain was early in the field of industrial development. We must remain among the leaders of that development, for that is the only way prosperity can be retained and increased for so large a population in so small a land. But these very facts—that the land is small and that long and intensive use has already been made of its natural resources—mean that we face great difficulties in winning the increasing quantities of coal that our industries and power stations require. Oil is an alternative and our great oil industry will, I have no doubt, continue to make a big contribution to our needs; but there is virtually no oil in these islands. This country, therefore, stands in especial need of a new source of power and it is for that reason that the opening of Calder Hall is of such particular importance for us.

Calder Hall is a beginning. Already we are planning and working for the developments that lie ahead. This station, and the twin which you can see being built alongside it will together supply nearly 150,000 Kilowatts of electricity, enough to light a town of a million inhabitants. Within a few months the U.K. Electricity Authorities will place orders with industry for the first commercially-built atomic power stations. These will have a larger output than Calder Hall. They will be followed by many others. It may be that, soon after 1965 every new power station built will be an atomic power station, and that by 1975 the total output of atomic power stations will certainly be more than, and may possibly be double the total electricity output of all the power stations that supply our needs for electricity today.

It is an ambitious programme. We are satisfied that, in Calder Hall, we have begun well.

I would now ask Sir Edwin Plowden, Chairman of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, to say something of the ways in which the Authority and industry are working together to make this programme a reality.

The Chairman of the Atomic Energy Authority.

Your Majesty, may I on behalf of the Atomic Energy Authority welcome you to Calder Hall.

We greatly appreciate the honour you have done us in consenting to open this station.

We are proud of this power station. And although the day will come when we shall look back on it with the same feelings that we now have for the first steam engine and for the first aircraft, future achievements will not be able to detract from the importance of this first great step forward.

The pace of advance has been rapid.

In 1937 Lord Rutherford himself said: "The outlook for gaining useful energy by artificial processes of transformation does not look promising."

That was less than twenty years ago.

Those twenty years have seen the Second World War and all the needs of reconstruction.

But, in spite of their other preoccupations, British scientists and engineers under the leadership of Sir John Cockcroft and Sir Christopher Hinton have moved forward and changed that unpromising outlook into the industrial-sized power station which stands before us.

I should like to express the gratitude of all of us in the Authority for the help that we have had from British industry.

As this power station has been designed and built we have made many demands, and British industry has responded with skill and success to them all.

From now on industry will play an even larger part.

The Atomic Energy Authority will remain a pioneering body.

But it is industry that will be responsible for developing and building atomic power stations for the electricity authorities at home and abroad.

For the last eighteen months four groups of firms have been studying Calder Hall and preparing themselves to build power stations of the same type.

They have already submitted tenders to the Central Electricity for the first two stations to be built.

The building of these stations will begin next year.

We believe that the experience gained in building Calder Hall will prove of great benefit and that these new stations will produce electricity at a price comparable with the most modern type of coal-fired stations in this country.

Nuclear power development with its exacting technical requirements has confronted industry with new problems in engineering, metallurgy and in other fields.

It will do this increasingly.

The lessons learnt in solving these problems are often of direct value in other parts of the engineering and chemical industries.

Even when they are not, the very fact that there are these problems, and that they are being solved, adds drive, confidence and momentum to the whole process of technical advance.

The Lord Privy Seal has spoken of the nuclear power programme and of its importance to the United Kingdom.

In this country we must live by our brains and by our skills.

Today we see here in Britain the birth of a new industry.

If we follow up this first success with vigour and determination, our country and the world will be assured of a source of power which will be inexhaustible for many generations to come.

Calder Hall is a supreme example of what can be done by the skills of scientists, engineers and workpeople acting together.

It is I believe a good augury for the future.

Your Majesty, on the control desk before you is a lever.

When it is pulled, it will switch electric power in the turbine house of the Calder Hall Station into the national grid of the Central Electricity Authority.

I now ask Your Majesty to open this Station.

To which Addresses Her Majesty was pleased to return the following gracious answer—

Today as power from Calder Hall begins to flow into the national grid, all of us here know that we are present at the making of history.

For many years now we have been aware that atomic scientists, by a series of brilliant discoveries, have brought us to the threshold of a new age. We have also known that on that threshold mankind has reached a point of crisis. Today we are, in a sense, seeing a solution of that crisis as this new power, which has proved itself to be such a terrifying weapon of destruction, is harnessed for the first time for the common good of our community.

In this turbulent century we have seen one technical revolution succeed another with astonishing speed. Within the span of a few generations our way of life has been transformed beyond anything our forefathers could have imagined. The age of steam was succeeded by an age of such startling achievement that we, who are close to it, can hardly realize that so short a period encompassed the invention of the motor car, the wireless set, the aeroplane and much else besides, which we now take for granted. So quickly have we learnt to accept the pace of modern development that we have been in danger of losing our sense of wonder.

That sense has been dramatically restored by the advent of the atomic age. We have been made vividly aware that the physical world, in which the great adventure of human life is lived, is of a complexity which must inspire in us a sense of awe. More than that; in the atom, man has discovered vast powers and ways to control them, and their tremendous possibilities for good or evil must fill us with a sense of humility. As new fields open before us, we become conscious that a grave responsibility is placed upon all of us to see that man adds as much to his stature by the application of this new power as he has by its discovery.

Future generations will judge us, above all else, by the way in which we use these limitless opportunities which Providence has given us and to which we have unlocked the door. They offer us, as we have heard today, a vital and timely addition to the industrial resources of our nation and to our material welfare. But above all we have something new to offer to the peoples of the undeveloped and less fortunate areas of the world, who will continue to look to us for assistance and example as they have done in the past.

That, to me, is the real importance of today's ceremony. For centuries past visionary ideals and practical methods which have gone from our shores have opened up new ways of thought and modes of life for people in all parts of the world. It may well prove to have been among the greatest of our contributions to human welfare that we led the way in demonstrating the peaceful uses of this new source of power.

I congratulate all those who have shared in this fine project—both those who conceived and planned the industrial application of atomic energy in this way, and those who have worked to see their plans fulfilled. And I hope this occasion will be an inspiration and encouragement to all who will continue this exciting enterprise, here and elsewhere.

It is with pride that I now open Calder Hall, Britain's first atomic power station.
